In an increasingly crowded digital environment, news organizations fiercely compete for our attention. They often challenge established news norms in the process, trading staid news coverage for heightened emotion and outrage. But it is unclear whether these approaches successfully engage audiences. This talk will center on the question, does outrage attract people to digital news, and, if so, what are the consequences?